EXTRACTS. THE SONG OF THE DISTAFF. T'sy distail take, of the ribbon white; S in, spin for thine own true knight The plaited shirt he shall one day wear, When thou shalt become his bride so fair. Thy distaff take, of the ribbon blue; Spin, spin, with devotion true And humble prayer, his priestly vest, Whose hands shall join you in wedlock blest. Thy distaff take, of the ribbon green; Spin, spin, with a fervor keen, The cloth, where scores of us then will throng. To drink, and to raise the nuptial song. Thy distaff take, of the ribbon gray; Spin, spin the broad curtains gay For bridal chamber and auptial bower, Dear Love's refection, and Virtue's dower. Thy distaff take, of the ribbon of gold : Spin, spin, with a pride untold, Weaving small robes with maternal joy. And swathing-hands for thy first bright hoy. Thy distaff take, of the ribbon red; Spin, spin of the daintiest thread A kerohiof fair, thy tears to keep, And dry thine eyes when then fain wouldst weep. Thy distaff take, of the ribbon black; Spin, spin, ere thy powers elack, The winding-shoot thou must one day win, Which one of us here will enwrap thee in.

A RELIC OF DICKENS. A correspondent says that there is an "old old lady who keeps it, and who had at that time a circulating library as well, as a collection of odds and ends, says that he spent a great deal of his leisure time there reading the current literature of the day as it appeared. She faithfully preserves a favourite chair of his, also a volume of the "Red River," which one day, in a passion, Dickens pitched at another customer's head. The customer had dared to abuse the author, who was defended by Dickens. On the other's saying "he'd like to punch Cooper's head." Dickens finished the argument by trying to knock bim down with the volumo. - Echo.
